For the first time in a decade, the majority of Americans are in favor of maintaining a large permanent US military force overseas. According to a CBS News poll conducted by YouGov, 56 percent of Americans, the highest percentage since the Iraq invasion, believe the US should remain involved in Afghanistan, but only 23 percent favor fighting a war there. Sixteen percent think the United States is the world's leading peacekeeper. This is certainly a followup on the success of Bush's surge as well as the strategy of the last four years. Personally I was not in favor of the surge, but that is beside the point. The above mentioned percentages are probably meaningless. The question should be rephrased to "Should the US be a leader in addressing international humanitarian issues?" I would give an affirmative answer, but the poll does not ask that. One thing that the most recent poll failed to indicate, however, is that

The injection nozzles of diesel internal combustion engines have a common feature in that they have a nozzle body with a nozzle bore and a piston is mounted in the nozzle body. At least one pressure chamber is formed in the nozzle body, the fuel that is injected by the nozzle is conducted to this pressure chamber and from it the fuel is moved by way of the nozzle bore into the combustion chamber of the internal combustion engine. The function of a pressure chamber is to increase the pressure of the fuel injected by the nozzle in order to achieve a desired pressure-fluctuation effect in the combustion chamber. In practice, the fuel to be injected is charged in the pressure chamber by way of the nozzle bore. The fuel to be injected is atomized in the pressure chamber, i.e. is distributed in a finely divided form, and as a result is able to penetrate into the combustion chamber as a liquid during the opening movement of the inlet valve. In nozzle bodies of a conventional design, the pressure chamber usually has a relatively small cross section in relation to the nozzle bore, so that they are therefore capable of affecting the pressure of the fuel to be injected very flexibly. However, in the case of diesel internal combustion engines, stricter emissions regulations and a greater fuel economy than ever before are required, and these require it to be possible to reduce the fuel that is injected into the combustion chamber as quickly as possible, i.e. in a targeted manner. A further problem in known injection nozzles is that the fuel that is injected by way of the nozzle bore cannot simply be ejected from the pressure chamber in an unprocessed state, i.e. before the fuel has been atomized. This is because the behavior of the fuel cannot always be described by a Newtonian description, but instead usually by a non-Newtonian description, for example as happens when, e.g., the fuel is injected from a chemical pump through a filter or from a needle pump. In the case of diesel internal combustion engines, in particular, the liquid fuel must first be heated by friction. It is consequently not possible to eject fuel from a
