While the hacking scandal surrounding Sony Interactive Entertainment is finally beginning to die down, Japanese portal Naver has begun selling original PlayStation 2 consoles, a result of stolen data from the company that ended up on the black market. Sony Computer Entertainment, the company that developed the PlayStation 2 (PS2) and the PlayStation 3 (PS3), announced this week that it had discovered "severe irregularities" in the network security of its domestic head office in Tokyo. According to a report from Reuters, the investigators who discovered the lapses last September traced it back to the company's overseas headquarters in the United States. While the investigation remains ongoing, Sony has quickly moved to deal with the breach of security. "At the time of discovery, there was no actual damage to the company's data or financial integrity," a representative from Sony Computer Entertainment told the Wall Street Journal in a short piece published on Thursday. "The investigation is ongoing and we are taking action." Naver, which sells Japanese goods on the U.S. market, sold the console for 8,998 yen (around $60) without any mention of who was behind the deal. Sony immediately began investigating the malware embedded in the stolen data by its rival Nintendo, which had also been hacked earlier this year. The investigation by the Japanese government was revealed in a series of massive data dumps that began last November. The government pledged to "take all necessary measures" to keep the situation "under control." Columns Current Affairs Two Years, No End In Sight, And Miserable Years pass swiftly, but each year seems to drag on more and more — especially when so much injustice has taken place during this time. Two years passed since the beginning of reform that has yet to be remedied. Without getting into detail, I'll just say that the Xinhua News Agency reports that Deng Xiaoping has died from old age at age 92. I still remember what I thought was the theme song from the new KTV show “The House Of Sword And Honour,” which was released in 2012. The song is about a sword that is both light and sharp. It indicates that even old old people have sharp minds. However, a sharp mind can also be a hurtful mind. In 2013, the land reform was officially completed. The elderly villagers were driven away from their houses. While some were placed in migrant worker camps, others had to go and stay in other areas.
