go where I want to go, and then I just have to do a follow the flow. I can't predict that in advance, or anything. I can try to prepare and study ahead of time and even sketch out a plan, but then there are so many ifs and buts that it just sort of works out. They always have so many ifs and buts when I look back over my archives. :P As to your last question, I definitely think that you should let the idea become a character in your own life before you create a comic! Make notes, sketches and let the idea "grow". A lot of things I do are just really good for my subconscious, but if I go back and say "this is what I did," it seems like I'm saying that I planned everything out ahead of time. It's true, and I'm sure you know that there are story arcs to be planned out, but sometimes it's too easy to get bogged down in the plan that leads to that. You just have to think on your feet when it comes to this stuff, and trust that you will have an idea when you need it. The premise of a planned story arc is also what gives it away to the reader. The typical origins series have a planned story arc that leaves off with a definite destination or climax, but the purpose behind that is generally left rather open. Rather, the reader sees where the story is going, but not in enough detail to guess where it is going. This generally causes complaints from the reader, who has been left in the dark without a clue as to where the story is going. This is the sort of thing that I wanted to avoid with the relationship between Selene and Bray. I wanted the reader to be able to see the path of the relationship between these two throughout the story. The reader is even left in the dark on the ending because it was a surprise to me as well. Oh, and I missed another audience that is most likely to read this: fellow dream chasers. I hope to see you in this one! :D Oh wow, what a great post! I'm curious to know how your writing compares to how you think about your artwork when you sit down to write. Have you ever had notes on that topic? You've been writing for a long time, right? I'm also

Did you know that, on average, a refugee or asylum seeker in Australia was convicted of a crime at a rate of 54 per cent? That's according to a report published in May 2018 by the Australian Institute of Criminology. In 2011, the rate was 70 per cent. Another report produced by the Melbourne Institute in 2012 stated that a refugee, on average, spent about $90,000 more than an Australian in the course of their lifetime. And the bulk of the savings came between the ages of 16 and 30. All of this is to say that if it is assumed that migrants are net contributors to our social and economic system, then we must ask why Australians born in Australia are more likely to pay taxes than migrants. In the words of Department of Immigration and Border Protection Commissioner Michael Pezzullo, 'we're a net contributor, not a net importer'. What about the claim that migrants can't find work? A study conducted by IBRIS in 2005 found that, despite the enormous costs involved in migration, not only is it possible for migrants to find work but that migrants are more successful than the average Australian in finding employment, although they are not immune to unemployment. In 2012, the Social Policy Research Centre (SPRC) confirmed that if migrants can find work then there is no such thing as 'unwanted' migrants. The Centre found that, unlike the oft-repeated trope that the number of 'illegal' migrants has increased over the past decade, what has actually happened is that the number of migrants is on the rise while the number of 'unwanted' migrants has remained steady or even declined. Yet despite all of this, Australian politicians and commentators continue to talk about migrants as though they are a scourge – a term to be avoided at all costs. Why? Simple. Refugees, asylum seekers and migrants contribute to the community in ways that overburden taxpayers, including the cost of law enforcement, hospitals and nursing homes. But this is a great reason to welcome them and make the rule of law apply to all, not just to the unfettered few. Last year, an Ipsos poll stated that the Rudd government was extremely unpopular among more than three-quarters of Australians. With the government in full panic mode over budget deficits and job losses, the Coalition launched a fresh round of scaremongering with its abysmal immigration policy.
