In this fMRI study, we investigated the neural basis of processing social information about the self when this information is directly relevant to the self (i.e., a self-descriptive photograph) or when it is a mere description of another person (i.e., a 'bio-photo'). Specifically, we were interested in whether such processing would be associated with increased engagement of regions implicated in self-focused attention (e.g., ventral medial prefrontal cortex, inferior parietal lobule), or regions involved in object/person-focused attention (e.g., fusiform gyrus, lateral occipital complex). Contrary to our expectation, processing of the self-descriptive photographs did not increase activity in regions associated with self-focused attention, but rather with object-focused attention. However, the processing of biological description of the self produced increased activity in regions of the brain's salience network, thereby indicating greater engagement of this network, including the bilateral anterior insula and posterior cingulate cortex. These findings suggest that viewing information about the self may involve engagement of the salience network, and that such engagement may depend on whether it is the self that needs to be attended to or not.[Tissue characterization and macrophage migration inhibitory factor in fetal hypoxic/ischemic

Large-scale analysis of osteoblast-like cells derived from human mesenchymal stem cells using pathway-focused microarrays. In this study, our goal was to analyze global gene expression profiles in osteoblast-like cells derived from mesenchymal stem cells (MSCs) at a genome-wide scale using microarrays. Analysis of osteoblast-like cell lines showed that osteocalcin was produced by osteoblast-like cells cultured in the presence of dexamethasone, and had a significantly positive correlation with alkaline phosphatase activity ( $r=0.89$ ) by enzyme-linked immunosorbent assay. To investigate the role of osteocalcin in the differentiation of human MSCs into osteoblasts, we carried out a microarray analysis of gene expression patterns in the MG63 osteoblast-like cell line that expressed osteocalcin stably. To identify genes regulated by osteocalcin, MG63 cells were treated with recombinant human osteocalcin (rhOC). Three independently prepared rhOC-treated samples were hybridized to the GeneChip Human Genome U133A whole genome oligonucleotide microarray set. A total of 517 genes were upregulated, and 335
