Rockingham to start hemp pilot plant The first of three hemp pilot plants is being constructed at the Rockingham Research Centre in Kleighley. The hemp plant, Cannabis sativa L, could help improve agricultural production and reduce water and chemical usage on farms. It is particularly suitable for low-input agriculture due to its efficient use of water and the fact that less fertiliser is required in its production. The research is funded by the University of Bradford's Hemp for Food and Fibre research theme, which aims to promote and develop research and teaching in the area of hemp for food, fibres and medicines. As part of the scheme, researchers will be trialling different crops in the field including hemp, the native Brassicaceae (such as Broccoli, Cabbage and Kale) and genetically modified mustard. The hemp plants will be tested over a five year period. This scheme is working in conjunction with the Young Farmer Initiative with the aim to improve the farming practices of farmers by providing practical knowledge and assist in the development of new technologies. Q: SQL Server 2008 stored procedure memory overhead I am storing a large amount of data in a single SQL Server 2008 database. To do this I am using one stored procedure for almost every use case. I figure for tables and string data the memory operations would be around a 4mb amt. I don't really know if that is correct for tables or not but for string data I would figure that would be much less than the documentation says it is (2mb). Anyhow, the type with the most data for me seems to be the Clustered Index. My question is about whether there are any other memory related considerations I should think about when using a stored procedure for the main use case for my app(the stored procedure has to be used as the main data access method, there is no other choice). If so, what would you suggest is the right memory size to allocate (is this common sense)? I know small thing can add up but I don't want the overhead of using stored procedures to outweigh the other benefits. Thanks for any helpful tips! A: I believe the doc page you linked says 2mb for string data. And for table data, it says 40mb. But as Paul said, those figures are for XML. All those figures are probably only relevant for a limited number of data types. [I'm not remotely an expert on the CLR memory manager, but I would guess the worst-case scenario is where the code marshalls itself into SQL server and uses new or moves data out of the SQL server into a CLOB, and then the data from the CLOB has to be moved back into the SQL server, possibly using the un-marshalled data (for example, creating a new table or an Index or stored procedure) as a source of data]. Another thing to consider is for performance, you have
