I've found the file as a torrent, but there's no way to download it, as it appears a valid torrent. What am I missing? A: See this Q&A for how to download a.torrent file. Or, you can download this.torrent file and see how it's unpacked: You may need to use the Readme.txt file in the downloaded zip file to figure out how to use the desktop torrent client to open the.torrent file. But you can also just use your web browser or the GUI torrent client to download the.torrent file. How to open.torrent file in Firefox By default, Firefox will associate.torrent files with a built-in software, called µtorrent, that it uses to create.torrent files (although you can configure it to use BitTorrent in general instead). To see what else is associated with.torrent files, you can open the Tools menu, then click Options. Then select the Open With menu item, and select another application. Select BitTorrent for torrents. If the file you have is a.torrent file, it should open in BitTorrent and show up as a torrent in the list. BitTorrent is more likely to be the default: if your file doesn't show up as a torrent in Firefox's Options -> Open With menu, then you can try to add the.torrent extension to Firefox's Known applications. Open the file in Firefox. In the sidebar on the right, click on "Tools." Find the "Preferences" button, and click on it. Go to the "Applications" tab. Click the button on the left side of the "Applications" tab that looks like "Add..." to add the.torrent extension. That probably makes your.torrent file the default application for.torrent files. A: Here is the solution - the torrent file you downloaded - is corrupt, containing an index that should have position 68, but starts at position 29. The first 5 packets of the file starting at position 29 contain a downloaded image, but don't contain the file's contents. They are small images of small
