Perry, on the other hand, attempts to restore the doctrinal construct of viewpoint neutrality, at least for advertisements. It was the celebrated 1986 case which created the first test of the sort suggested by Miller. The court, sharply divided, held that limiting the government's ability to limit legitimate speech to solve its purported "viewpoint neutrality" problem runs the risk of turning the First Amendment into nothing more than a redundancy. The court instead suggested an alternate solution to the perceived dilemma - the use of "content discrimination" of the sort that the Court had previously explicitly rejected. The Court specifically rejected such a solution because it was too susceptible to abuse. Notice that under the proposed solution, you might find a prosecutor having an opinion: "It shouldn't be allowed because it would be an abuse of power to use the "right" of free speech for conduct the law forbade because it was cruel to animals." The court instead adopted a form of the traditional doctrine of neutrality of the sort Justice Brennan has since described as "the perfect antidote to the triviality and futility of the "viewpoint discrimination" approach to regulating speech under the First Amendment."
