Humphrey Bogart was in his late 60s when he made this picture for Warner Brothers, director William A. Wellman in his 50s and a young Gary Cooper. The movie, made in 1949, is a remake of the 1941 Republic film "The Town with No Name," itself based on a Dashiell Hammett novel. In the movie, Bogart plays Dalton Trumbo, a Hollywood screenwriter who faces a new tax on his earnings. He goes into hiding, but becomes increasingly paranoid, as he has no idea who is trying to reach him through the dead-drop system and whom he should trust. One of the modern elements in the film is that Trumbo receives a phone call warning him about the threatening letter a mobster has sent. The electronic equipment on the phone is part of this boxy telephone, created by Saul Bass. One of the leads in "The File on Thelma Jordan" (1950), a remake of the 1937 movie "Lifeboat," is Vincent Price. A talented stage actor, he was looking to break out of the horror movie genre. Here he is in "Rashomon" (1950), a remake of the original Akira Kurosawa movie "Rashomon" (1950). From left: "Rashomon" (1950), a Hollywood-Japan collaboration; "The File on
